

The Art and Practice of Public Leadership: A Hands-on Academy

A revolution is taking place in how public leaders are cultivated and managed. Organizations can no longer expect that, when they face a leadership void, a pool of qualified and motivated candidates will miraculously appear.

Today, the concept of “growing your own” leadership is permeating organizations of all types. But while many have recognized this need, few have sustained a way to successfully develop and retain leaders.

The Art and Practice of Public Leadership is more than a training program. It is a comprehensive, customized leadership development effort that requires the organization’s top leaders to be involved in and committed to its design and delivery.

In this program, experienced consultants work with your organization’s top executives to design a curriculum that includes organization-specific examples and case studies. Once the agenda is agreed upon, we create a comprehensive candidate selection process that supports your organization’s succession planning efforts.

The delivery of the Art and Practice of Public Leadership is tailored to your needs. Some organizations choose to offer workshops weekly while others hold them monthly. However the schedule is arranged, the program’s content focuses on practical, thought-provoking, and challenging concepts that apply to real-life experiences of public leaders.

Typically, the Art and Practice of Public Leadership training includes:

- a multi-rater feedback process,
- individual development planning,
- action learning through an organization-specific project, and
- a variety of subjects including risk taking, collaboration, and political savvy.

Allow the Management Education Group to help you aggressively address the challenge of developing and retaining leaders through the Art and Practice of Public Leadership program.
