

Converse, Connect, Commit: The Art of Engaging Public Employees

Why would anyone want to work in the public sector these days?

Public agencies are facing unprecedented change, leaving employees feeling frustrated, disengaged, and uneasy about their future. As a recent IPMA HR-sponsored survey found, only 58 percent of public sector employees are fully engaged in their jobs. In addition, a high number of young workers—47 percent of those 34 years old and younger—said they were either “very likely” or “somewhat likely” to leave their jobs if working conditions do not improve. This tells us that maintaining high levels of employee engagement is tough. But it’s not impossible.

Superseding demographics, economics, and politics, a shift is happening in the public sector workforce unlike anything ever seen. Long-held beliefs about working for government have been shattered as workers bring new expectations to the workplace. Public sector leaders must heed the new trends that are revolutionizing public sector employment.

Marnie Green, a public sector veteran, takes a thought-provoking look at what’s happening in the minds of public employees. Then she offers public sector leaders options for engaging their employees during these uncertain times.

Join Marnie for her honest—and inspiring—examination of how organizations are keeping employees engaged under tough circumstances. By the end of the session, you will learn:

- How to foster a committed, engaged public service workforce
- What attracts committed employees to work in the public sector
- How to leverage daily workplace conversations to transform culture
